Audio devices such as wireless headphones are becoming increasing popular. Many of these headphones include a pair of ear pieces connected by means of wires that provide audio output to the headphones. One or both ear pieces may be configured to electrically fit over the ear of a user of the audio device. Ear-pieces that attach to the ear with an adhesive are also increasing in popularity. Wireless headphones have become increasingly desirable due to their flexibility. For example, wireless headphones are comfortable because they do not constrain the ear in any way, e.g., wires on the ear-pieces do not physically constrain the ear. Users of wireless headphones desire that the ear pieces not fall off and be lost. Similarly, users desire that the ear pieces be easy to use and quick to attach, and to detach, from the ear. A problem with the adhesive ear-pieces is that they are sometimes difficult to stick on the ears of users. In particular, if the adhesive ear-pieces are too sticky and do not stick to a desired location on the ear of the user, the ear-pieces may be torn off the user's ear or the ear-pieces may fall off the user's ears. Some adhesive ear-pieces have a highly desirable tackiness to which ear-pieces attach readily and do not fall off of the user's ear, but only when the user's ears are in a particular orientation. For example, the ear-pieces may adhere well to the ears of the user if the user's ears are facing up, e.g., with their tops facing up, but do not adhere well if the user's ears are facing down.
