I love the fact that you can choose any custom size icons, makes things easier if you have any problems with the standard sizes. Thank you for the positive review, I'm glad to know it has worked well for you! (9.8 stars) Alexander 2 years ago Rated 4 out of 5 by Cienfuego Nice tool, but I had some problems with some of its features: * When there are several programs accessed at the same time, some of the data is shown multiple times, when its only shown once and its most recent access is shown. * When I try to close the program it says its closing, but after a few seconds the progress bar comes and it just closes. Thank you for the feedback, I'll make sure the next version address some of the problems, specially the feature where several programs are opened at the same time. The lipoprotein profile of atherosclerosis. The development of atherosclerosis is frequently accompanied by profound changes in the plasma lipoprotein profile. These changes are highly heterogeneous, depending on the severity of the atherosclerotic process. New information has been obtained about the nature of lipoproteins involved in the pathogenesis of atherosclerosis. The results of recent studies suggest that the increase in the concentration of circulating triglyceride-rich lipoproteins is, at least in part, the consequence of an activation of hepatic VLDL-TG secretion. The type of apolipoprotein associated with these lipoproteins influences their removal from plasma. Chylomicrons and VLDL may be removed by the hepatic and the intestinal surfaces, respectively. Low-density-lipoproteins are recognized by receptors in the hepatocytes and are endocytosed. The receptor-mediated endocytosis of VLDL and LDL can be modulated by the cholesterol content of the lipoproteins. In hypercholesterolemia there is an increased internalization of LDL, apparently via LDL-receptor-mediated endocytosis. In contrast, the endocytosis of VLDL is reduced, leading to an accumulation of VLDL
