Trell.Komplet.v19.34.Incl.Keygen.CZECH-rG Serial KeyQ: Header file included before main file According to these C++ header file rules (8.2.2.3p1): After the text of a source file has been read, processed, and converted into an object file, and before any actual code is executed (except as explicitly specified), each header file shall be processed as if it appeared in the source file before any code appearing in the source file I'm using the GNU C++ compiler (g++) to generate code. I have a single source file, "test.cc" that includes a header "test.h" along with my source code. During compilation, my compiler complains that it cannot open my header file: test.cc: In function `int main()': /home/fnd/src/test.cc:1: undefined reference to `test::myFunction(int, int)' The problem I have is that my header file is being included before any of my code in the source file. I know that the header file is being included because the linker error still reports that the header is a part of the compilation, as indicated by the path to the file. Is there any way that I can prevent the header file from being included before my code? Note: There are no include guards or declarations in either the source or the header file. A: Your header is being included before main. g++ requires that header files always be included AFTER main. A declaration in a header file may cause the file to be linked BEFORE main. The specifier "extern" means that only declarations in the header file are "exposed" as global variables. (See: C++03, section [dcl.decl]/2.) 2), BaseDevMode::Mode()
