Even when they're just days old, babies have a heady mixture of hormones in their blood – including the luteinizing hormone (LH) and follicle stimulating hormone (FSH). These natural reproductive hormones are elevated in a newborn baby's blood until they reach their first "menstrual period" – typically about 8 to 12 weeks after birth. Exposure to sex hormones in the womb can have a major impact on brain and behavior development, and there's growing evidence that perinatal hormones affect brain development well beyond puberty. While scientists have found that progesterone (the female hormone most closely associated with pregnancy) can alter brain and behavior development, it's unclear whether testosterone and oestrogen, the male and female hormones closely related to pregnancy, play a role. [Read about kids' perception of gender roles.] "It's widely believed that a mother's sex hormones are the main driving factor of a child's gender identity," said Dr. Meghan Carson, a pediatric neuropsychiatrist and assistant professor of child psychiatry at NewYork-Presbyterian/Weill Cornell Medical Center in New York City. Last month, Carson and her colleagues published a study in the journal Pediatrics and the British Medical Journal suggesting that elevated testosterone or oestrogen before birth might disrupt gender identity development in some babies. In other words, testosterone or oestrogen in a mother's blood before birth could alter the way her unborn child thinks about himself or herself in the womb. 1. Sex hormones are triggered in the fetus's brain The developing brain of a fetus is remarkably plastic – more plastic than the adult brain, in fact. A baby💎
