Adjusting colors Photoshop gives you multiple ways to change the brightness, saturation, and colors of individual pixels in the image. You can either access these adjustments from the Adjustments panel or make changes in the Channels panel. The Adjustments panel (as shown in Figure 1-4) provides you with a great many tools for changing the tones and colors of your image. It enables you to fine-tune the entire image, change the color balance, enhance the overall image, and much more. FIGURE 1-4: The Adjustments panel offers a lot of controls to fine-tune the image. When you access Adjustments, the panel opens. You see a list of `_adjustment layers_` that enable you to make changes to the image's colors. (`_Adjustment layers_` is the preferred name for this feature, because the word `_layers_` is usually reserved for a Photoshop feature that overlays multiple layers to edit an image.) This type of adjustment is also known as channel or color balancing. After you apply an adjustment to an adjustment layer, you see a preview of the adjustment in your image. (I describe adjusting these layers in the next section.) If you want to make a particular adjustment but aren't sure which color you want to enhance, choose Color from the panel's drop-down menu, and then choose a color from the menu that opens as you hover over the color. You can Choose an adjustment layer. When you select an adjustment layer, the Adjustments panel displays a panel of tools that enable you to fine-tune the image's colors. You can access the same tools that appear in the Adjustments panel by choosing the adjustment layer in the Layers panel and then choosing the Adjustment icon at the bottom of the panel.
