Motion capture technology collects over 150 different data points per player. The real-life players were recorded in motion, capturing their every action and movement on the pitch. This allows players in-game to reflect their real-life likeness in amazing detail. HyperMotion Technology on FIFA 22 allows players to make quicker, more reactive decisions. They have a more fluid, reactive skill set and are able to make better decisions at all stages of the game. I'm not sure how motion capture technology that allows you to capture every movement on the pitch for a complete high-intensity game fits into the "reactive" decision making category. What I can tell you is that I just picked up my new copy of FIFA 20 and started a game and went a total of 7 matches without the match even starting to load. Even before it "loaded" I had 5 player calls for fouls. Now imagine that happening in the games I pre-ordered. Reaction time and response time is a two-way street. If you slow things down, it takes longer to make a decision, which means you'll be "busier" and may miss opportunities. If you go faster, it's easier to react and make decisions more often, but that means things are going to move faster and players may beat you to the ball. There are many factors you would need to account for in a Football game, even before you take into account the motion capture data. Things like algorithm runs, handling of center backs, attacking players, and defenders. I'm honestly not sure there is a perfect way to play a football game, I think it is a never-ending battle to find the right balance of speed/precision/adaptability/etc. but it's not just the player models. Edit to update on my experience with a new model of game. I pre-ordered this game on Friday the 13th and have had zero issues. My first match started at 9:55AM and it actually wasn't until 11:06 that I got to kick a ball. That includes kicking the ball into the other teams goal. That isn't a fun feeling in any sense of the word but that is the system design. Once the match starts you can get in a few quick matches but once again the teams start winning. If you choose a low difficulty setting I was able to complete a total of 5 matches in 3 hours. I may have been on the lower end of middle class difficulty and you are able to play at higher difficulties but
