Description of the Prior Art In many fields of technology it is desirable to measure the concentration of an element in a material, for example a metal which has been subjected to solution treatment at elevated temperature and which exhibits a rapid diffusion rate of the species under consideration. If the diffusion is a diffusion with front propagation, the mean time for the front to reach a specified point from the source is of the order of a few minutes, a level for the element is maintained during this period of time. It is only in the last part of the time during which the level is maintained that the relationship of the concentration with time can be established. The level is subsequently measured. The earlier measurement is very costly in that the element in the material which has been used is consumed. Malignant bone lesions: what can be expected by us today?
