The use of electrical heating cables and particularly those of the type employed as steam and hot water heating means are well known. As the electrical cables of this type are exposed to considerable variation in the temperature of their environments, a heater of this type must be of some very high quality in order to maintain its electrical properties during their extended working life. Such a cable usually comprises a metal core, a sheath of insulation surrounding the core and a protective outer jacket. The heating element or winding is usually formed by a bundle of individually insulated copper wires enclosed in an outer jacket of a material such as polypropylene. Such a combination would be reasonable if the heat generated by the cable is dissipated wholly by the outer jacket as would be the case with electricity. However, it is also desirable to permit some dissipation of the heat generated within the heater, since this will slow down the heating up of the cable and will extend the life of the heater. At the same time the dissipation of heat out of the heater will lower its temperature of the heater winding to that of the environment. There have been many efforts to improve the efficiency of electrical resistance cables by such devices as end caps and the like at the ends of the coil of windings or otherwise. Most of these devices have, however, done so at the expense of convenience of use, installation or manufacture. One known prior art device which has the advantage of being easy to manufacture and simply assembled to a cable is one in which the outer jacket of the heater windings is corrugated, and in which the cable is wound in closely adjacent convolutions around a paper layer or flocking mounted on the end of a core or tube. Such devices are shown in U.S. Pat. Nos

In polycystic kidney disease, several features of renal cystic diseases such as the retention of fluid within cysts, the hyperplasia of the epithelium lining the cysts and the secretion of mucin by the cyst epithelium are abnormalities in the elaboration of urine resulting from defective Na reabsorption by the cyst epithelium. The primary defect in the polycystic kidney is the failure to properly elaborate vasopressin. A similar defect can be produced experimentally by: (i) inhibition of protein synthesis by cycloheximide; (ii) inhibiting the
