Please send any comments or bug reports to: DeepSpace[dot]Above[at] DeepSpaceAbove[dot]com "One in four British men are considered too shy to approach women, according to a new YouGov poll. The poll reveals that one in five British men would rather offer friends a drink than ask out a woman they fancy, while just two per cent of men ask their friend's girlfriend out. The survey also found that three per cent of British men would ask their best friend's mother to go on a date with their friend. The survey also reveals that a smaller proportion of women felt men are too shy than men themselves, with 31 per cent of women feeling men are too shy to ask a woman out, compared with 19 per cent of British men who said the same. Mike Ford, Your Sexuality Editor, said: "Male shyness is a real problem that needs to be taken seriously. Many young men struggle to articulate a good opening line and approach women they fancy." "It's becoming an embarrassing taboo. It's time that we took male shyness seriously and worked together to tackle these problems. "Asking girls out is the most effective way of increasing one's own sex appeal. Asking women out is a tried and tested method." While women, on average, are more likely to ask out a potential date, being too shy may mean some people will never get to use their gift for getting
