SLT, small leucine-rich protein3, is expressed in developing tooth in non-smokers and decreases with aging in smokers. Small leucine-rich proteins (SLRs) comprise a large family of secreted and membrane-associated proteins that are most abundant in the skin and teeth. To compare the tooth expression of SLR3, a novel member of the SLR family, in patients with periodontitis, whose smoking habit and related factors, gender, age, obesity, and dietary habits may be confounding factors. Patients were divided into 2 groups, those smoking (n = 12) and not smoking (n = 25). The healthy control group was not treated with smoking (n = 20). SLR3 mRNA expression was examined in the gingival tissue. The ratio of the SLR3/Beta-actin mRNA level in the gingival tissue was calculated. There was no significant difference in SLR3 mRNA expression between patients not smoking and healthy controls. However, SLR3 mRNA expression in smokers was significantly decreased compared with healthy controls (P = 0.018), even after adjusting for gender, age, obesity, and dietary habits. Smoking decreased SLR3 expression in gingival tissue. SLR3 may participate in inflammatory processes of the gingival tissue in smokers. According to the Los Angeles Times, the intruder forced his way into the home in the city's Los Feliz neighborhood, "shot his 79-year-old victim in the face, then emptied a clip of ammunition into the body." Police are investigating whether it was an attempted robbery or if the shooting was motivated by family ties. The victim, Lawrence Spanos, and his 88-year-old mother, Dorothy, were the only people inside at the time of the break-in. Dorothy told NBC4 that the thief may have been after her jewels. Officer Tony Im told the Los Angeles Times that the homeowner was "feisty," throwing the intruder over a back fence and "fighting him."
