The industry standard color mode for photos is RGB, so Photoshop can automatically convert all of your images to that color mode. JPEG, GIF and PNG are common formats you may encounter. After you have images in RGB mode, you can change their color and tonal balance in the Adjustments panel found in Photoshop's toolbar menu. There, you can choose from one of three color modes, and an extensive panel of adjustments for exposure, shadows, highlights, and many other adjustments enable you to lighten or darken the image, adjust color and tone, sharpen or soften the image, desaturate or desaturate your image, and perform a variety of other effects. After performing adjustments, you may want to export the image to a suitable file format. Many image formats are represented by a number. JPEG, the current industry standard, is represented by the number 100 (jpg). If you're looking for something more portable, you may want to export the image to a GIF or PNG format instead. To rotate an image, choose Image > Rotate > Rotate Left or Rotate Right. Click and hold the image as you drag it on your canvas. If you want to flip it horizontally, drag it to the left edge of the canvas, or drag it to the right edge of the canvas to flip it horizontally. To flip it vertically, drag it to the top edge or the bottom edge. Organizing your image If you're creating a collection of multiple images, organize them into folders in a creative way that makes sense to you. We suggest that you save the images to a folder that includes the image name as a subfolder of its name. For example, if you were saving a series of images of houses, you might call the folder `2013 Houses` or something similar to that effect. The first image in the series would go in the folder called `2013 Houses/IMG_0630`. The next image would go in the same folder, but in the `2013 Houses/IMG_0631` folder, and so on. The organization of your folder is entirely up to you, but it's good to have a folder structure that helps you keep track of where everything is. By default, Photoshop opens your images in a new window. For your convenience, Photoshop opens the files in the folder that you saved them to. However, you can change that setting to open the file in the folder instead of Q: SVG Linear Gradient with Responsive Height I am trying to get a linear gradient to scale along with the height of the parent. I have given height:100% to the tag but it did not work. Also I have used transform:scale(1,1) and other things but it did not work. A: You can't do this with linear gradients. Here's how you might create such a gradient: .container { display: inline-block; width: 100px; height: 100px; background: #000; } .container { width: 100px; height: 100px; background: url("") center; background-size: cover; } Bob Jordan, left, offered the wrong answer to a trivia question on German Chancellor Angela Merkel's birthday.
