Protection against the effects of a mentally challenging environment by both types of learning: training and experience. Evidence from animal research has shown that the effects of stress on the immune system and cancer may be reduced by learning to escape these effects of stress, or by learning the dangers of a stressful environment. This study examined whether the effect of a mentally challenging environment, such as an IQ test, would be reduced by training or by experience. White male medical students (N = 246) were randomly assigned to one of three groups: a group receiving no training in IQ tests, a group receiving testing training before the IQ test, or a group receiving IQ test training before the IQ test. Each group also differed in how many IQ tests were completed before the IQ test. Those participants who received IQ test training showed a stronger decrease in the negative affect that is associated with stressful tests than those who received no training. This could be interpreted as a transfer effect, such that the experience of IQ test training protected against the negative effects of a stressful IQ test.

Audio from this story Share In the years following an investigation by the Justice Department, Wilmington's white collar crime unit has become the envy of the nation. One case that's caused the DOJ to dance to the tune of local prosecutors is that of former city councilman Ron Fenn. Federal law enforcement officials have been in business with Fenn since the 1970s. Fenn has had a long history of fighting with the justice system, from controversy over whether to prosecute him on drug charges in the 1980s to lawsuits over whether he's been discriminated against in getting his pension. What remains of Ron Fenn's career When Fenn was convicted of racketeering, conspiracy and extortion, he was sentenced to serve 18 years in federal prison. Now he's back out on bail and trying to repair his life in Wilmington, but not everyone will let him.

Shortly after Fenn came out of prison, a Delaware state trooper pulled him over for speeding on Interstate 95. "I was
