an obvious, if subtle, reference to the fact that Alfred is born on the birthday of Odin, King of the Anglo-Saxons and founder of the Frisian order of the woden beadles, which had been created specifically for Alfred. During the campaign of Frisia, Alfred had to fight during the winter of 879–880 against the combined forces of Viking chieftains, although he was there for only a few days before leaving for home, leaving his son Eardulf as the last of the woden beadles. It may be that this reference is a part of the reason why Alfred never held any formal judicial position, possibly because of the oath he took in 874 to protect the equal rights of all the people, and therefore protecting the lower status of the Frisians. The narrator implies that "he [Alfred] was the most famous and most powerful of the young men of his time", although he implies that this is not meant to be taken literally and is rather meant as a reference to the fact that he was "the most famous and most powerful of the young Englishmen of his time". The note that Alfred's nobles were upset that he had not added a substantial sum of money to the ransom price of Eanred from the Danes is a reference to Alfred's failure to pay back the ransom money for Beornwulf, although Eanred was just one of Alfred's many sons and, presumably, was not the eldest.
