speak their mind. We all tend to dislike them, but to make them out as the “bad guys” is stupid. =) Something I would like to add is that often times not using computers and not having a personal computer doesn’t mean “not being technologically savvy”, it just means that you have a different style of “technology”. If you don’t like your smart phone for instance you wouldn’t necessarily get into an argument with someone who owns one and wants to use Facebook, because you see it in a different light. That’s my point. The point isn’t to say you’re uneducated or inferior (everyone thinks they’re superior to someone else and that’s a good thing), but to say that what you’re saying is important to you and different from what I said. I agree with Muhd Sha’ban. I think that there’s no need to start bashing everyone who doesn’t own or even has an interest in the iPhone.

People should have the right to choose whatever device they want. Then, some of us will choose to have a different set of values than some other people. That’s fine. Let’s just give each other the right to be different. There is nothing un-American about that. You make an interesting point about the iPhone. I must admit that I do like the iPad, too. I got it as a gift, and I am very glad I did. I even ordered an iPad 2 to go with it. :) I did not think that we should be bashing anyone who does not have a PC. I would like to add that I could care less what type of mobile phone any of my family members have. It is not in my interest to know what models they own and what they Microarray technology for the evaluation of human cancer cells in vitro: comparisons with single cell PCR. We have used cDNA microarrays to measure gene expression in two groups of human cancer cell lines in vitro: the luminal (e.g. MCF-7, T47D and SKBR3) and the basal-like/triple-negative (e.g. MDA-MB-468, HCC70 and BT20) subtypes. The gene expression profiles of these two groups were
