cod waw zone english patch.ff...The problem is that in the introduction to the article, the following is stated: "The availability of short-term loans to college students has exploded in the last few years," said James. "When I was president of the Student Loan Marketing Association (SLMA) in 2008, we had 12,000 active loan officers. Now, we have 20,000. In addition, short-term loans are available on a day's notice, and as a result of this flood of loan activity, the rates on these loans have plummeted." The problem with this statement is two-fold. First, colleges and universities have been admitting more high school graduates than ever before. This has been cited as one of the primary causes for why college costs have skyrocketed over the last several years. A better way to describe this would be "alumni are voting with their wallets" but I digress. Second, the SLMA does not exist anymore. It has been absorbed into a different regulatory agency. Some of you who have been around awhile remember the days of Sallie Mae which was once the largest credit agency used in the United States. I'm not sure if this is the proper comparison or not but I will leave it up to the reader to choose. The point is that there are not 12,000 loan officers on the street anymore. This is a very misleading statement that serves as another erroneous excuse for lending.
