We evaluated the effect of long-term low-dose cyclosporine (CSA) and methylprednisolone on calcium homeostasis in 13 children with severe nephrotic syndrome. By using a pool of serum for each patient, immunoglobulin and albumin levels, the relative bioavailability of CSA and prednisone, and serum binding of total and ionized calcium were determined at two different sampling times. The mean total and ionized serum calcium levels were high at the initial and at the second sampling time when compared with normal controls. Prednisone, in the form of single daily doses, resulted in a significant decrease in the total and ionized calcium levels. CSA did not affect the parameters studied. Albumin levels were significantly lower than controls at the initial sampling time, but at the second sampling time the difference was not significant. The relative bioavailability of CSA was greater than that of prednisone. Methylprednisolone administration in excess of 1 mg/kg/day can be associated with severe hypocalcemia. When the dose is reduced, the therapeutic range is not exceeded. The pathogenesis of the hypercalcemia, in these patients, is not related to the catabolism of methylprednisolone, but rather to the lack of feedback regulation due to the severity of the disease. during the pandemic as well.
